Free September film screening aims to save lives in Wilkes County

'Suicide: The Ripple Effect' chronicles the story of man who attempted to take life by jumping from Golden Gate Bridge

ASHEVILLE, N.C. – Northwestern North Carolina residents are invited to a free film screening that shines a light on people who are using personal experiences with suicide to help others find the hope they need to stay alive.

"Suicide: The Ripple Effect" will be presented from 6 to 9 p.m. on Thursday, Sept. 27, at the Stone Family Center for Performing Arts, located at 613 Cherry St. in North Wilkesboro. The film screening is open to the public and will be followed by a panel discussion with local experts about suicide prevention. The event is presented by Vaya Health, a public managed healthcare organization serving western North Carolina, and sponsored by Vaya's Consumer and Family Advisory Committee.

"Suicide is a concern in every community, including in western North Carolina," said psychiatrist Dr. Craig Martin, Vaya's chief medical officer. "This film draws attention to the issue so that people in crisis can find hope and get help before it is too late. Suicide is a tragic response to what is often a temporary problem, and it leaves devastation for survivors and communities, but it is often preventable with available services and supports. Treatment is available right here in the Wilkes County area."

The film chronicles the story of Kevin Hines, who at age 19 attempted to take his life by jumping from the Golden Gate Bridge. Since then, Hines has been on a mission to use his story to help others find recovery and stay alive. The film also features some of the world's leading suicide prevention experts and the stories of individuals who are using their own experiences with suicide to help others find hope.

Clinicians from Daymark Recovery Services will be on hand to provide support and answer questions about local mental health services. Western North Carolinians seeking help for depression or other mental health concerns are encouraged to call Vaya's toll-free, 24/7 Access to Care Line at 1-800-849-6127.
